

AC Vill, GL Stanley, C Cochrane, B Chan, K Kortright, B Rahman, A Lee, Y Sun, J Stewart, CJ Britto-Leon, ZM Harris, JS Talwalker, V Shabanova, PE Turner, JL Koff

Nebulized single phage therapy in stable subjects has mixed clinical outcomes.

Pseudomonas aeruginosa isolates from the sputum of a phage-treated person show trade-offs between phage resistance and virulence.

Conclusions

At 14 days post-screening, P. aeruginosa isolates from the sputum of a person with cystic fibrosis show resistance to infection by the therapeutic phage LPS-5.

This phage resistance phenotype comes at the cost of reduced growth and, likely, reduced expression of virulence-related genes.